Learn Radicals

The 214 Building Blocks of Chinese

INTRODUCTION

Chinese has a system.
This guide shows you what it is.

Chinese characters aren't random. They're built from a small set of recurring visual pieces called radicals. There are 214 in the standard Kangxi system — each carrying a core meaning: water, fire, heart, hand, mouth. When you spot a radical inside a character, it tells you what that character is about before you even know the word.

How characters are built

Most Chinese characters (~80–90%) are built from two pieces:

- Radical — hints at meaning. See 氵 on the left? Probably water. See 忄? Probably a feeling.
- Phonetic component — hints at pronunciation. These aren't a fixed set; you absorb them naturally as you learn more characters.

Take 河 (hé, river). The left side is 氵, the water radical — that's your meaning clue. The right side is 可 (kě) — that's the phonetic component hinting at pronunciation.

From components to words

Chinese is modular at every level. A small number of components combine into characters, and characters combine into words:

- Components → Characters: 氵 (water) + 可 (kě) = 河 (river). A few hundred components produce thousands of characters.
- Characters → Words: Most modern Chinese words are two characters combined. 火 (fire) + 车 (vehicle) = 火车 (train). 电 (electric) + 话 (speech) = 电话 (telephone).

The meaning logic carries through. The water radical 氵 appears in 河 (river), 海 (sea), 湖 (lake) — and those characters then form words like 海鲜 (seafood), 湖边 (lakeside), 河水 (river water). One radical connects a whole web of vocabulary.

Why study radicals?

Phonetic components number in the thousands and are best learned through exposure. Radicals are different — there are only 214, and maybe 50–60 really common ones. They're a small enough set to study deliberately. Learn them, and every new character starts making more sense. That's what this guide is for.

About this guide

Every radical is organized into 17 themed families and paired with example characters showing the pattern in action. Each entry also includes the radical's Chinese name in pinyin — this is what native speakers say when describing how to write a character.

Radicals are shown in simplified Chinese. Of the 214, the vast majority look identical in both systems — only about 11 changed during simplification. Where the forms differ, the traditional appears in brackets, marked with *.

Quick example

water radical (sān diǎn shuǐ — three dots of water)

河 river · 海 sea · 泪 tears · 酒 alcohol

See 氵 on the left of each character? It's related to water.
